We regret to announce this unpleasant fact, but it will not barm them to know of it. Go where you please in much the largest and fertile counties of Virginia, you are sure to find fences burned, fields growing up in young pines, persimmons and broom straw. This picture is rendered still more gloomy by the absence of all indications of comfort and prosperity. Horses, sheep, hogs and borned cattle are rarely seen. and a solitary "condemned horse" driven (by some rheumatic negro who is too old to be tuga cious) to a plow which cuts a furrow about three inches deep, is the sole reliance for a crop of many a farmer who owns a thousand acres of good arable land. The owner resides probably in a dilapidated house, unconscious of paint, the roof and chimney of which have been ventilated in a curious but not becoming manner by stray cappon balls and spherical shell. He is not an ideal of cheerful, contented prosperity. The pailings of his yard and garden have long since fed the bright camp fires of not over scrupulous Federal or Codfederate soldiers, and a solitary cow, and a dozen predacious hens, regard all attempts at gardening as benevolent contributions to their personal comfort.

This neglected and useless land, these trouble some domestic fowls, together with the cow, a living skeleton of a pig, a hungry, wolfish lookof meal, make up the worldly wealth of hundreds and thousands of our once prosperous! farmers.
